Goal of the Course
The main purpose of the course is to guide students step by step with meaningful activities that combine four skills (listening, speaking, reading and writing), grammar, target words and authentic materials to reach the upper intermediate level (B2) and to make them acquire the predicted outcomes of the course at the highest level. In addition, it aims to support the use of four basic skills with academic skills such as note-taking, synthesizing and making presentations by giving students a critical perspective. During the course, students explore contents related to different topics by listening to and reading in order to use English effectively, and then develop their written and spoken language with learning-oriented vocabulary and word forms.

Learning Outcomes for the Course
(The learning outcomes for the relevant level are determined by taking into account the needs of the students in accordance with the descriptors in the Common European Framework of Reference for Languages (CEFR).)
The students who have successfully completed this course will be able to:
LISTENING	understand dialogues about many general topics even in a noisy environment. They can understand recordings in the standard form of language that are likely to be encountered in social, professional or academic life and determine the content of information as well as the perspectives and attitudes of the speaker. They can understand standard spoken language on both familiar and unfamiliar topics normally encountered in personal, social, academic or professional life, either live or via broadcast. They can follow the shifting conversation between speakers of the target language. They can reliably understand detailed instructions. They can summarize and evaluate the main discussion points on topics within their academic or professional competence. After listening, they can use indirect expressions and explanations to complete gaps in vocabulary and structure. They can follow the discussions on topics related to their field and understand in detail the points highlighted by the speaker. They can understand most radio documentaries and many other recorded or broadcast audio materials presented in the standard form of the language, and they can describe the speaker's mood, tone, etc. Provided that the topic is quite familiar and the direction of the conversation is indicated by clear signs, the students can follow long speeches and complex series of discussions. They can understand announcements and messages on concrete and abstract issues spoken in standard spoken language at normal speed. They can follow the fundamentals of lectures, speeches and reports, and other forms of academic/professional presentations that are complex in terms of proposition and language. Provided that the conversation is conducted in standard colloquial language, the students can understand the speaker's point of view on issues related to their current area of interest or expertise.

READING	can detect the reasons given in the text, the integrity of the paragraph, and the order of the plot in the context. They can predict the meaning of keywords in a text and write titles for each paragraph. They can distinguish an opinion stated in the text, clues, examples, and how the examples support the main topics. They can extract meaning from the context in the text. They can quickly scan long and complex texts and place relevant details and necessary information in the spaces provided. They can collect information from different parts of a text or from within different texts to perform a specific task. They can contextual cues to understand the main idea of the text. They can understand articles or reports in which contemporary problems related to the point of view or opinion adopted by the author are stated. They can become aware of the factual information contained in a text and, thus, the effort to persuade the reader. They can identify the different structural elements in which discussions that involve inconsistent comparisons, problem-solution-oriented contents and content that establishes a cause-effect relationship are used together.
SPEAKING	interact with native speakers with fluency and spontaneity at a level that makes regular interaction quite possible. They can actively participate in discussions in familiar contexts, explain and support their views. They can provide clear and detailed explanations on a wide range of topics related to their area of interest. They can explain the point of view on a current issue by giving the advantages and disadvantages of various options. They can participate in a discussion or conversation with a person about various topics. They can describe their personal experiences in a conversation. They can take turns asking and answering questions. They can describe personal experiences in everyday conversations. They can take turns telling stories and responding. They can plan and organize a story, set the scene, and organize the main events. They can ask and answer questions by paying attention to body language and verbal cues. They can work collaboratively to make a list of things that make cities attractive. They can interview a person, take turns, and respond to what people say. They can communicate spontaneously in longer and more complex parts of the speech. They can talk about how to feel and how to behave in difficult situations. They can talk about things they feel strongly about (for example, embarrassing mistakes or things that make them depressed). They can present information about a topic to the class.
WRITING	write clear and detailed texts on a wide range of topics related to their interests. They can write an essay or report that conveys information or provides justifications that support or oppose a particular point of view. They can write letters emphasizing the personal significance of events and experiences. They can use comparative forms in a written expression. They can check their writing, correct mistakes, and edit them. They can write an informal e-mail explaining how they feel and what they do. When writing, they can use descriptive language such as adjectives and adverbs. They can use conjunction phrases to list advantages and disadvantages. When editing their writing, they can present examples, add ideas, put forward opposing ideas, offer reasons, and present conclusions. They can check and edit a piece of writing for grammar, punctuation, or spelling mistakes. They can write a story chain using conditional structures. They can write arguments for and against a statement. They can introduce, emphasize and generalize a topic.
